Understanding Chicago's Citation Systems: Notes and Bibliography

The Chicago Manual of Style (CMOS) offers two primary citation systems: the Notes-Bibliography (NB) system and the Author-Date system. For church history, the NB system is overwhelmingly the preferred choice due to its capacity for detailed scholarly apparatus, which is essential when dealing with the often intricate and multi-layered nature of historical evidence.

The Notes-Bibliography System Explained

The NB system relies on numbered footnotes or endnotes to cite sources within the text. Each note corresponds to a superscript number placed at the end of a sentence or clause, signaling the reader to consult the accompanying note for source information. This system allows for extensive commentary and the inclusion of source details without disrupting the flow of the main narrative. Following the notes, a bibliography is provided, listing all sources cited in the notes, alphabetized by author's last name.

Why NB is Ideal for Church History

Church history often involves citing a variety of source types, including archival materials, sermons, theological treatises, denominational records, and oral histories. The flexibility of the notes system allows for precise attribution of information to specific documents, even when quoting extensively or paraphrasing complex arguments. Furthermore, notes can accommodate explanatory comments, cross-references to other parts of the work, or brief discussions of source provenance that might be too detailed for a parenthetical citation in the Author-Date system. This level of detail is vital for scholarly credibility in the field.

Crafting Accurate Citations for Primary Church Documents

Primary sources form the bedrock of church history. Properly citing these materials in Chicago style requires careful attention to detail, as these documents can vary significantly in format and availability.

Archival Materials and Manuscripts

When citing materials from church archives, such as letters, meeting minutes, or congregational records, the citation should include the specific document title, the author or creator (if applicable), the date of the document, the name of the archive, and the collection or box number where the item is housed. For example:

- First National Bank of Chicago, Ledger, July 1905, Series 3, Box 12, Chicago Historical Society, Chicago.

It is also crucial to provide the specific folio or page number if available. If the document is unpublished, this should be indicated.

Published Primary Sources

Published primary sources, like historical theological works, early church histories, or collections of documents, are cited similarly to any other book. The key is to accurately identify the author, title, publisher, and year of publication. If you are citing a specific edition, such as a critical edition or a facsimile reprint, that information must be included.

Sermons and Oral Histories

Sermons, whether published or unpublished, should be treated as distinct works. If a sermon is published in a collection, cite it as a chapter within that book. If it's an unpublished manuscript or recording, include the preacher's name, the title of the sermon (if any), the date it was delivered, and its current location (e.g., personal collection, archive, transcript). For oral histories, cite the interviewee, interviewer (if known), date of interview, and the repository holding the recording or transcript.

Navigating Secondary Sources in Church History Research

Secondary sources, which are scholarly analyses of primary sources, are also critical for building a comprehensive understanding of church history. Chicago style provides clear guidelines for citing these as well.

Books and Monographs

When citing a book, the full bibliographic information is required: author's full name, title of the book (italicized), place of publication, publisher, and year of publication. In the notes, a shortened form is used after the first full citation. For example:

First citation in note: John Smith, The History of the Early Christian Church (New York: Religious Press, 1998), 45.

Subsequent citation in note: Smith, Early Christian Church, 102.

Journal Articles and Chapters in Edited Volumes

Journal articles require the author's name, article title, journal title (italicized), volume and issue number, and the year of publication, along with the page numbers for the article and the specific page(s) cited.

Chapters in edited volumes follow a similar pattern, indicating the chapter author and title, followed by "in" and the editor(s), book title, and publication details.

- Jane Doe, "Baptist Expansion in Illinois," Journal of American Religious History 25, no. 2 (2005): 150.
- Richard Roe, "Reformation Theology and Society," in Essays on Early Modern Europe, ed. Sarah Lee (Oxford: University Press, 2010), 78-99.

Formatting Essentials for Church History Papers

Beyond citations, adhering to Chicago's formatting guidelines ensures a professional and readable document, which is crucial for presenting your church history research effectively.

Manuscript Preparation

Chicago style recommends specific margins (typically 1 inch on all sides), double-spacing for the entire manuscript (including block quotations), and a legible typeface (like Times New Roman or Arial) in 12-point size. Page numbers should appear in the upper right-hand corner of each page, starting with the first page of the text.

Block Quotations

Longer quotations (typically 5 lines or more) should be formatted as block quotations. This involves indenting the entire quotation from the left margin and omitting quotation marks. The period at the end of the quotation should precede the citation number.

Tables and Figures

If your church history paper includes tables or figures, they should be clearly labeled with sequential numbers and descriptive titles. Notes for tables and figures should appear directly below them. Ensure that all visual elements are integrated logically into the text and are referenced by number.

Common Challenges and Solutions in Chicago Style for Religious History

While comprehensive, Chicago style can present challenges, especially when dealing with less common source materials or intricate denominational structures characteristic of church history.

Handling Complex Denominational Structures

Some denominations have complex hierarchical or decentralized structures, leading to multiple potential archival locations or varied naming conventions for official bodies. The key is consistency and clarity. If a particular denominational body is consistently referred to by a specific name, use that name throughout your work, and explain any abbreviations or alternative designations in your first note or in a glossary if necessary. Ensure your citations accurately reflect the repository where the specific record was found.

Citing Denominational Publications and Periodicals

Denominational newspapers, magazines, and official reports often have unique citation needs. Treat them like journals or magazines, ensuring you include the publication name, date, and specific page numbers. If citing a specific report or resolution, ensure the official title and date of adoption are clear.

Consistency and Accuracy

The most common pitfall is inconsistency. A minor deviation in formatting or citation detail can detract from the credibility of your work. Always refer to the latest edition of The Chicago Manual of Style and consult style guides specific to church history or religious studies if available. Proofreading meticulously for citation errors is paramount.

Specialized Terminology

Church history is replete with specialized theological, liturgical, and organizational terminology. While Chicago style doesn't dictate specific terminological choices, it requires that terms be used accurately and consistently. Footnotes can be useful for defining or contextualizing these terms when their usage might not be immediately clear to a broader academic audience.

Key Takeaways for Chicago Style in Church History

Mastering Chicago style for church history involves a commitment to detail, consistency, and understanding the nuances of religious documentation. By carefully applying the Notes-Bibliography system, accurately citing a wide array of primary and secondary sources, and adhering to formatting standards, researchers can produce scholarly work that is both authoritative and accessible. The meticulous nature of Chicago style ultimately serves to enhance the reader's trust in the presented historical narrative, allowing the complexities of faith and institutional development to be explored with clarity and precision.

FAQ

Q: What is the primary citation system recommended for church history papers using Chicago style?

A: The primary citation system recommended and most commonly used for church history papers employing the Chicago Manual of Style is the Notes-Bibliography (NB) system. This system utilizes footnotes or endnotes for in-text citations and is supplemented by a comprehensive bibliography at the end of the work.

Q: How do I cite an unpublished manuscript from a church archive in Chicago style?

A: To cite an unpublished manuscript from a church archive, you should include the author or creator of the document, its title, the date it was created, the name of the archive, and the specific collection or box number where it is housed. If a page or folio number is available, it should also be included. For example: John Doe, "Letter to the Vestry," March 15, 1920, St. Mary's Parish Records, Box 7, Archdiocese of Chicago Archives, Chicago.

Q: What information should be included when citing a historical sermon in Chicago style?

A: When citing a historical sermon, if it is published in a collection, treat it as a chapter in a book. If it is unpublished, include the preacher's name, the sermon's title (if it has one), the date it was delivered, and its current location (e.g., in an archive, a personal collection, or as a transcribed document).

Q: How does the Chicago style handle citations for denominational records versus other types of historical documents?

A: The Chicago style handles citations for denominational records similarly to other archival or manuscript materials. The key is to be specific about the document's origin, title, date, and location. For official denominational publications or minutes, you would treat them as you would any other published or unpublished report, ensuring you clearly identify the body that produced the record and the specific meeting or publication.

Q: What is the difference between a footnote and an endnote in Chicago style, and which is preferred for church history?

A: Footnotes appear at the bottom of the page where the reference is made, while endnotes are gathered at the end of the text, chapter, or document. Both are acceptable within the Notes-Bibliography system. For church history, the preference often depends on the author or publisher's guidelines, but endnotes can sometimes be preferred for longer works or when extensive notes are anticipated, as they do not interrupt the reading flow as much as footnotes can.

Q: How should I cite a denominational newspaper article in Chicago style?

A: To cite a denominational newspaper article, you would typically include the author's name (if bylined), the article title, the newspaper's name (italicized), the date of publication, and the page number(s). For example: Jane Smith, "New Mission Established," The Christian Herald, April 20, 1955, 3.

Q: Is there a specific Chicago style guideline for citing oral histories related to church history?

A: Yes, for oral histories, you should cite the interviewee, the interviewer (if known), the date of the interview, and the repository or collection where the recording or transcript is held. For example:
Interview with Sister Agnes Mary, by Father Michael Brown, July 10, 2010, Oral History Collection, Box 15, Catholic Historical Society Archives, Chicago.
